The Zimbabwean dollar (ZWD) is the official currency of Zimbabwe. It is a unit of account in the country and is also used for domestic transactions. The Zimbabwean dollar is divided into 100 cents. The currency is managed by the Reserve Bank of Zimbabwe (RBZ), which is responsible for monetary policy and controlling inflation. The Zimbabwean dollar was introduced in 1980 to replace the Zimbabwe Rhodesian dollar (ZRD), which had been in circulation since 1980. Since then, the Zimbabwean dollar has undergone several reforms and devaluations, and it is currently subject to high inflation rates. The Zimbabwean dollar is subject to fluctuations due to economic uncertainties and political instability in the country. As a result, the value of the Zimbabwean dollar can vary significantly over time, and it is important for businesses to stay informed about currency exchange rates and inflation to make informed decisions.

The Zimbabwean dollar has been a subject of media attention in recent years, with articles discussing its declining value and the impact of inflation on the country's economy. The following are some of the key articles related to the Zimbabwean dollar:
